Clorox Employees to GLBT Youth: It Gets Better

OAKLAND, Calif., Aug. 22, 2012 - A group of employees of The Clorox Company has joined together to send a message of hope to gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender (GLBT) youth, who studies show are disproportionately impacted by bullying and suicide.

The employees produced a video in support of the It Gets Better Project, a worldwide movement to show young GLBT people the levels of happiness and acceptance they can reach by persevering through their teen years. Watch the video.

"No one should have to endure bullying and violence," said, Senior Vice President - Chief Innovation Officer Wayne Delker, who serves as executive sponsor of Clorox Pride, the employee resource group (ERG) for GLBT employees and their advocates. "This video is a message of hope from Clorox employees who are living proof that, as tough as life may seem at times, it really does get better. One day you'll be able to say, 'My life is amazing, and I wouldn't change who I am for anything.'"

Clorox actively supports and advocates for workplace equality for GLBT people. The company has fully inclusive equal-employment policies and provides equal-employment benefits. Clorox has earned a 100 percent score for the past six consecutive years on the Human Rights Campaign's Corporate Equality Index. Last year, Clorox Pride received the 2010 ERG of the Year award from Out & Equal Workplace Advocates. The company's five ERGs - African-American, Asian, GLBT, Latino and women - are a key part of the Clorox's diversity and inclusion strategy. These groups enable people to connect with one another and collectively with Clorox. The ERGs also provide insight on multicultural marketing, supplier diversity initiatives and community outreach programs. Open to all Clorox employees, the ERGs help ensure access to support, inspiration, and personal and professional development.
